Most of the time, you never know which of the Emil's many subletting demons you'll be forced to face in a single conversation, ranging from sadness to stupidity to harshness, and there's never a proper segue or prologue to introduce the new character to the audience.

There are a whole host of new actors and subplot characters coming to center stage and what you are left is only a wild guess as to who is who. Many who have dealt with this come away struck by the regret that they didn’t buy the program at the front counter.

Fear not, you are not alone with these feelings and rest assure that programs can still, freely, be purchased at the front counter.

Buying a program might be a good investment given that this is but “Act One” of the story.

Just a thought.

The bus came to a sleepy stop in the village of Poplar Bluff, clunking and whizzing by.

It excitedly spewed out a cloud of deep black carbon smoke that enveloped the assembled crowd of onlookers and vendors who were loudly hawking their potentizing powders.

A wealthy man paid the driver to run on backroads

I waved my hands fervently, attempting to regain my balance, and exclaimed in my most articulate New Age British accent, "Please halt the coach!"

I fail to understand the fascination, Bubba!

Long before the earth was flattened, I devised a brilliant idea of creating a phonetically-designed guidebook of the most widely-used and vivid British expletives that
